
While in Ireland, Chris had spent much time reading, meditating and contemplating about the world. She read spiritual books on various perspectives on life: everything from yogic philosophy, the Upanishads, the Bhagavad Gita to Krishnamurti, Mahatma Gandhi and Chang Tzu. She came to see how the modern-day world was very male-oriented, and disrespectful of feminine values such as mothering and nurturing. This trend, she learned, did not benefit men, either. Chris increasingly understood that men were not necessarily comfortable with feeling like they needed to be macho. Reading the Tao Te Ching and Tsultrim Allione's Women of Wisdom affected her greatly at that time. The most poignant message she derived from Tsultrim Allione's work was a beautiful message in the preface, where the author spoke of often receiving appreciation for her work, but seldom for motherhood—something she personally considered as her biggest achievement.

When Chris' son had just turned nine and her daughter five, she gave birth to her third child, Roderik. Practically still-born, the little child remained trapped in his body for just over two days, with various tubes keeping him breathing. On the third day, his life support was withdrawn. Roderik's short life made Chris view life very differently. She began to value life more, gaining the courage to get out there in the world, and to make a difference. Shortly after Roderik's passing, Chris began a course in a form of Tibetan psychotherapy, called the Tara Rokpa therapy, which involved short retreats and workshops but was mostly geared towards home-study and meditation. She also took on the role of coordinating her batchmates and arranging venues for the workshops. However, during this time, Chris's relationship fell apart and she became homeless, with two children and a dog in tow. Chris had a chance to move into a women's shelter, but that would have meant losing the dog, which had always helped them to cheer up after Roderik's demise. Instead, they went 'woofing', where they helped out on organic farms in exchange for food and accommodation. Chris applied for a grant to set up a not-for-profit natural health organization. She went into business with a
